Barton Bibliography, Introduction.

Part One

This Bibliography has been compiled in 2012 with much help from; Geoff. Bryant, John French, Anthony Berridge, Nigel Land and Nick. Lyons, to these I am much indebted. Furthermore during the course of this project a working group started regular meetings with the aim of producing an available database (with some additional sections to this bibliographical list) of book collections in Barton other than private collections. I am indebted to Peter Smurthwaite and other members of this group for support given. This group continues to meet and in the course of their deliberations has compiled inventories of collections of books held by the Civic Society, by Baysgarth Museum and by Baysgarth Secondary School. Where relevant, titles have been included in this Bibliography.

It was my decision to produce the inventory in chronological order according to the year published plus some appendices. I think this format shows clearly how and when publications have evolved.

Ideally this Bibliography would have included a column showing where the books are/were housed. This would have been a very big task and in the fullness of time may/would have become inaccurate – indeed some of the titles are known to have existed but as to whether any survive, and if so where they are, is not known.

Some of the publications listed have relatively small sections on Barton but the topic is (usually) clear from the title and the Barton references in the publication are important for an understanding of the particular aspect of the town and its history. Some readers may consider that some titles in Appendix 6 should have been located in the main list, and, conversely, some in the main list should have been placed in Appendix 6. Suffice to say that the writer had to make many subjective decisions and that the whole document should be consulted as one.

The Bibliography has been produced as an ‘open document’ so that the list can be regularly updated. It is intended that it be accessible in digital form and as ‘hard copy’.

The term used to identify the town varies, i.e. ‘Barton’, ‘Barton on Humber’, ‘Barton-upon-Humber’ etc. The names used in the Bibliography, where certain, match those in the original publication.

Part Two

In 1817 Thomas Rickman published his An Attempt to Discriminate the styles of English Architecture which established the classification for medieval church buildings (Norman, Early English, Decorated and Perpendicular) still in use today. The book included a number of specific references to St. Peter’s church, Barton-on-Humber which he thought ‘may be real Saxon’. Henry Ball, a local printer, was presumably aware of this classification when he printed his general history of Barton in 1856 (reprinted in 1969 and copies of which are still available) as was Robert Brown, a local solicitor, who published his two-volume general history of the town in 1906 and 1908. Both these general histories were thoroughly researched and excellent studies for their day, although some of their speculations and conclusions would be questioned today.

Other studies of the early 20th century, some un-published, included the works of Thomas Tombleson, Canon W.E. Varah, Thomas Sheppard (the first curator of Hull Museum and brought up in South Ferriby) and the homespun writings of Fred Clipson. Francis Bond’s volumes English Church Architecture, published 1913 and studies by Antiquarian and Architectural Societies drew further attention to the significance of Barton’s two Medieval churches, the studies of St. Peter’s church culminating in Taylor and Taylor’s Anglo-Saxon Architecture, 1965, and more recently in the landmark volumes by Prof. Warwick Rodwell St. Peter’s Church, Barton-on-Humber, Lincolnshire: A parish church and its community, Vol. 1, Parts 1 and 2.

Various Trade Directories describe the town from the 1850s onwards while from the early 1960s the study of Barton’s modern history (post c. 1700), and that of many other communities in the region, centre on the publications of Rex and Eleanor Russell who first came to Barton in 1951. Rex was first tutor-organiser for the Workers’ Educational Association and later outreach tutor in the employ of Hull University. From the early 1970s this remarkable expansion of local history studies was furthered by Geoff Bryant, local W.E.A. tutor-organiser until the early 21st century, many of the resulting publications being compiled in collaboration with groups of local adult students who themselves became confident and committed local historians.

Following the publication in 1994 of Bryant's Early History of Barton upon Humber a group of local authors have worked on a series of high quality publications (seven by 2013) under the collective title of the Later History of Barton-upon-Humber.

A casual comment recently that Barton must be, 'The most thoroughly researched and written about small town in Britain', is a proposition that would be hard to prove, or indeed disprove, but Barton must surely be 'in the premier league'.

Trade Directories.

Trade Directories were produced on a county by county basis by various publishers from the 1820s to the 1930s. Throughout that period Barton was on the northern edge of the 'Riding' of Lindsey which, although having a separate county council, was for trade directory purposes part of 'Lincolnshire'.

Some original trade directories are in private possession in Barton and some photocopies exist. All may be studied at Lincolnshire County Archives, St. Rumbold St., Lincoln.

There follows a list of most trade directories;
